Q

My ex is in the house with the kids, and won't let me see them when I want. And I am paying all the bills for the house, and she won't agree to list it for sale. I am willing to be fair, but she just won't listen! What can I do?

A

During these COVID-19 times, some couples feel that they are stuck, because they can't agree on a separation agreement, and they believe that the courts are closed and thus they cannot get anything done.

This isn't the case- the Courts are cautiously opening up, through teleconferences. While Court appearances dealing with all issues at the same time are not as yet possible, if you and your ex have one or two pressing issues, such as resolving a summer access schedule and relieving financial strain by listing the house for sale, the odds are good that you will obtain a hearing in a month or less. Our lawyers have recently been successful in securing a number of these Court dates, which are designed to move your issues forward to resolution.

I urge you to act now and retain a family lawyer in organizing your Court application and related materials rather than waiting until the Courts fully re-open, because there will be delays due to backlogs, and you are also likely to avoid making an expensive mistake which could negatively impact your future, including custody, parenting and financial issues.

A family lawyer can advise you about the financial documents you will require including paystubs, tax information for the last three years, debt and financial statements.

If you start working on your separation/divorce issues now with the help of an experienced Family lawyer, you are better equipped to both handle the complex legal system and also positively influence the outcomes in your favour.
