A

I have good news for you – while studies have shown that children are negatively impacted with being exposed to ongoing, long-standing conflict, when couples separate, cease their conflict and focus on the children, the children bounce back and do very well.

Many couples successfully separate and actually become better parents post separation. The ongoing conflict ceases by choice as the parents work with professionals to resolve their issues, and the children cease to be exposed to their parents' daily hurt and bickering.

There are many avenues to accomplish this outside of litigation – working out a separation agreement, attending mediation, or retaining collaborative law professionals, are all successful routes.

Finally, if possible I would suggest that you and your wife proceed on your best behaviour, then move forward on separating by contacting a family lawyer.

Thank you for choosing us to help you.

Q

My wife and I are always fighting and we can see that it is hurting the kids. We know the marriage is over, but I am scared to leave because of the children. What can we do?
