CALL US - BEFORE
YOUR EX DOES!

A

Yours is a classic example of the struggles many couples face with respect to the Family Responsibility Office's [FRO'S] role in delayed enforcement of a court Order which was made a long time ago, and which does not necessarily reflect the more fluid circumstances concerning the children.

To avoid sleepless nights, I suggest that you gather up the old Order, any correspondence to and from the FRO and/ or your ex and her lawyer with respect to child support or child support arrears and book a consult with a family lawyer, who will be able to assist you with the substantive calculations.

Basically, you will want to figure out whether what you owe your wife in child support is more than what she owes you, or the other way around, and approximately how much. Once you know that, you can decide to bargain, fight it out, or simply put the whole issue in your rear-view mirror, by agreeing to terminate ongoing support and any arrears. Whatever you decide, make sure that it is reflected in a new Order to the Family Responsibility Office.

Q

Our children are all grown up, but now FRO has come after my wife for enforcement of arrears, and as I made more money than her, and sometimes the children lived with her, she is coming after me for child support arrears, even though she was a moving target when the children were little and never paid. This is so unfair! Her lawyer wrote me a nasty letter and is threatening me. What should I do?
